

by: David Clink • for your 2017 Aurora Award consideration (Poem/Song category) first appeared in "The Role of Lightning in Evolution" • Chizine Publications

Fall 2016, pgs. 19-20 • ISBN-13: 978-1-77148-401-5 • [CANADA]

The Word Dragon

For A. F. Moritz

And when I woke again the earth was underfoot and the sky had ceased to be the sky, it was covering behind a large rock.
The rock isn't a rock, it is a stone the Word Dragon said, so the sky (it was the sky, in fact) had been hiding behind a stone.
Behind the stone I glimpsed the ocean.
Behind the ocean, the tropical island where I grew up, the memory of those I loved, my mother and father in the backyard reclining on lawn furniture, the ridiculous hats they wore, the wood fence torn down in later years, replaced by an aluminum one, my brothers and sisters playing with the water hose beneath the date and palm trees, the birds and paper wasps on about their business, a birdbath brimming with cold, clean water, the house where I learned to tie laces.

Annoyed he once flew through something so cowardly, the Word Dragon grabbed the sky by the throat and drop kicked it heavenward, his wings an angry unfurling of letters forming complex words and phrases, his scaly neck convulsing an opinion, his vertebrae a list of connecting words, his snout a W, his feet capital P's as were his eyes, his sex forming the word 'need.'

The Word Dragon said,

The earth is the earth, it always was and always will be.

I laid my head down in the field and when I woke the earth was still the earth, and the sky was above me, and curled in a foetal position, a tropical island hiding behind something round, big, something of the earth but different somehow.

A boulder? I asked.

And the Word Dragon smiled and said, Yes.

I could smell the ocean behind it.